

Treehouse Secrets

by magidont

Category: Earthbound

Genre: Humor, Romance

Language: English

Characters: Claus, Lucas, Ness, Ninten

Status: In-Progress

Published: 2016-04-10 18:08:55

Updated: 2016-04-10 18:08:55

Packaged: 2016-04-27 20:28:16

Rating: M

Chapters: 1

Words: 1,224

Publisher: www.fanfiction.net

Summary: Often mistaken for blood-related twins, Ness and Ninten have carried a cherished friendship for as long as they remember. What was a project constructed over a boring summer became their hangout spot for fun, and for adolescent secrets. Then they realize hiding away everyday is not enough to suppress their naive desires, and decide to take it out on another pair of innocent twinsâ€¦

Treehouse Secrets

**Heyo, this is a collab between me and LordLenne (leonanson)

>**Sorry for the bullshit amount of code, since this is a collab, he sent it over to me and it got all fucked *sigh***

**you can also read this on Leon's tumblr! We both collab uploaded as well

>Enjoy!

* * *

>The two boys cherished their great companionship for as long as they could rememberâ€”ever since they realized they were next-door neighbors. Although their first meeting was shocking, they became acquainted rather quickly. Both of their parents believed they would be great friends since their meeting, and their expectations came true. It could be said that both Ness and Ninten have been next to each other for a lengthy part of their lives, acting as openly best friends.

Ness and Ninten were two extraordinary boys in their grade. It was because that they both had similar visual features: hair color and length, facial features, height, and body structure. Even their voices developed to be alike as well. Often they continued to be mistaken as identical twins, despite having no familial relations at allâ€”the fact shocking every new acquaintance they made. However, it was not bizarre for them to consider their selves as brothers in a platonic sense, in fact they liked the idea as it made them feel more special. However, the fact that they weren't related didn't stop them from beginning and keeping a valuable bond with each other.

Both boys felt the need to be around each other in school as much as they were outside, at least every day if not every second. Their friends would comment on their constant proximity, and both would agree. They appreciated the popularity that their attachment to each other had gained during their school lives; many girls would swoon or compliment how "cute" their friendship was. It would be a lie to say that they were not fairly well known at school, as they had a genuine group of friends around them as well, and most peers in the grade know the extent of their fame.

Neither of them had much to complain about their lives. They enjoyed the occasional greetings they got from familiar, but not greatly acquainted classmates, the games they played with their truer friends, the group work they completed with each other, and everything else daily school life offered.

There was one peculiar thing unique to their lives, however.

Recently, they had both built a tree house that grew on Ninten's family garden, but crossed over easily to Ness' property, making it accessible to both sides. It was a project done out of boredom during summer break, but was fixed up to match their interests. It became their hideaway and hang out spot almost every day, whenever they had the free time. Their time together consisted of talking, playing their handheld video games, doing homework, and anything else they were closely comfortable with. Sometimes they would even spend a night in two comfortable pillows and blankets, much to their parents' worry. Both of them would spend a good chunk of their daily lives in the tree house: a development that united them closer than before.

Perhaps the tree house let them bond together too much, however. Ninten was the first of them to bring something to the tree house that astonished the both of them: graphic material. He had brought a magazine that satisfied their curious adolescence to the tree house, viewing it together as a secret only to them. The magazine that Ninten brought consisted of clothesless women, which shocked their expectations at first, but didn't fail to arouse their curiosities even more. Ness had thought, "what about how older boys looked?" Ness had brought a laptop he owned, and they both shared its use for what two quickly sexually developing boys would be curious about. After learning more than what they wanted to initially find out, they eventually took their friendship to a higher level that they didn't knew would reach before.

They kept their secret activity to only their selves for a while, coming to the conclusion that they both accepted how they felt after viewing such explicit material, consisting of mostly adult men. Anxious to confess at first, they were both unsure of how to tell each other their true feelings about the matter of what sexually aroused them, worrying about receiving judgment from the other. However, they blurted their thoughts to each other easily, and cried in happiness.

Despite finalizing their feelings about the matter, they have yet to tell anyone else, and they both intended to keep it like so for a long whileâ€"until at least they were somewhat older. It was not often to have two fifteen year olds confident in their own homosexuality, and what made the feeling more difficult is that they both had the experience of a brave few girls crushing on them, in which they had to awkwardly decline them and lie about why. Their usual excuses were something along the lines of, "Not really looking for a relationship right now, but maybe another time?" or "Sorry, I don't think I have the time because of baseball practice all the time and I don't want you to be alone a lot." However, they carelessly admitted to caring about their admirers' feelings, and that only encouraged them to develop greater crushes.

There was eventually the matter when they considered dating each other, since they both admitted to being gay. To some, it seemed like a great idea. However, they both agreed not to date each other as they both felt uncomfortable of potentially ruining a still stable 12-13 year friendship. They both considered the consequences that could have occurred with dating each other, and did not want to risk it. They believed something could go too wrong with a more open relationship, which might cause them to cease speaking with each other at all, worrying their friends and families, and eventually disclosing their homosexuality to answer others' questions. That sort of idea terrified the both of them. They weren't sure if everyone around them were truly accepting, and they did not want to find out so soon at their young age.

For now until the start of their high school lives, Ness and Ninten continued to spend their time together hiding away in their private tree house as very close friends. However, still in the youth of curious and growing adolescence, they would still view their lewd material on occasional evenings, whenever they both were in certain moods. They would satisfy their selves with their dirty secrets in peaceâ€"next to each other, but never too close together.

As the days passed, they both hoped to meet other gay boys around their age eventually. They have yet to meet any, or probably have met some that have also kept their feelings in complete discretion, which they agonized about the possibility. If only they met another couple of boys who were as interested in the matter of sex like them, but the chance of that happening was as slim as Ness and Ninten's fated first meeting.

Perhaps if Ness and Ninten had conveniently met another pair of twins, then all of their concerns would be relieved to their likingâ€|

End
file.